Hemophagocytic syndrome in a patient with rheumatoid arthritis and thyroiditis: a case report. In patients with rheumatoid arthritis (RA) the association of anemia, neutropenia, thrombocytopenia and splenomegaly is known as the hemophagocytic syndrome (HPS) with onset in severe infection or malignancy. HPS is also known as macrophage activation syndrome (MAS). It is rare in RA. There is only one previous case report in the literature of MAS in RA, which was associated with non-Hodgkin lymphoma. The cause of MAS is unclear, but it is possible that antigens produced in the inflamed synovial joint of RA patients may lead to uncontrolled immune activation. The hallmark of this disease is overproduction of large quantities of proinflammatory cytokines. We describe a case of a patient with RA with HPS. This case suggests that MAS should be considered in the differential diagnosis of anemia, thrombocytopenia and splenomegaly in RA patients. It may also indicate the presence of an underlying disease that may be important to treat in order to resolve HPS.
