Then, you are prompted with a set of multiple-choice questions, simulations, simlets, and testlets you need to handle, with a timer being there to assess the swiftness of your reactions. In the learning mode, flashcards are available for you to glance into so that you find out contextual references whereas revealing the answer to any question can be done as well. What's more, pausing the timer is an option, and to prevent eyestrain, changing the font size can be done by clicking a button in the main window. Assess your skills and progress Other than that, in both modes, it is possible to take notes in order to mark any of the questions with remarks that may subsequently prove useful, with the possibility of skipping any of the ones you deem too difficult at a specific point in time. The fact that reviewing the percentage of processed questions is possible can only be a plus since it lets you know how effectively you have spent the time. At the end of the test, comprehensive statistics are displayed, with your score being shown for each category in part, aside from the percentage describing your overall performance. Saving and printing your result can be done in case you want to make comparisons in the long term. We examined the effect of cell-free osmolarity, changes in serum glycerol concentrations, and cAMP on phagocytosis in equine polymorphonuclear leukocytes (PMN). When suspended in an isotonic saline solution, phagocytosis in PMN, as measured by percent Fc-IgG-opsonized, zymosan-activated, infected chicken red blood cells (CRBC) uptake, and by the uptake of 3H-glucosamine-labeled CRBC, was unaffected. When the cells were suspended in a 0.5-M sucrose solution, phagocytosis was increased 1.5-fold over that observed in isotonic saline. Serum osmolarity was decreased by adding glycerol to the saline suspending medium. Reduction of osmolarity of the suspending medium in which PMN were preincubated for 20 min prior to CRBC stimulation, but not in the preincubation medium alone, increased phagocytosis by 50% over that observed in medium containing 0.5 M sucrose. Phagocytosis of 3H-glucosamine-labeled CRBC was enhanced by incubation of cells with serum containing 0.3-0.7 molar glycerol and was equivalent to that measured in cells incubated with 1.4 molar sucrose. The effect of cAMP was examined by preincubating cells for 60 min with 3 microM dibuty 09e8f5149f
