Houston is part of a region struggling with a problem unique to low-wage jobs: They're located in low-wage regions. In 2009, Hirschsprung said, more than half of all Texas jobs were in the top 20% of the state's wage scale, with the median wage at $11.57. Today, 49.1% of Texas jobs are in the top 20%. That's the lowest rate in the country, according to the Economic Innovation Group, a nonpartisan public policy research organization. And in Houston, it's worse. A local jobs report from the Houston chapter of the EIG shows 47.3% of jobs pay below the Houston average wage, the fourth-worst rate for large metros across the country. In other words, almost half of all Houston jobs are low-wage jobs — an average of 15.6% less than the Houston average wage — and that's left too many residents with too little income to cover basic expenses. The main reason for this is the region's rapid growth. "The only answer is the lack of supply," said Richard Harris, a professor of public policy at Rice University's Kinder Institute of Urban Research. "Most of our jobs are in the private sector. And that's where you put in that new housing stock." The region's problem is the same as that of other cities in the United States: Too many jobs pay too little for the average wage to support a family or an individual. As a result, our state is the third-biggest "wage-depressed" state behind California and the District of Columbia, according to an EIG analysis of census data. "It's an oversimplification to blame our state or city for poor wages or unemployment," said Richard Florida, a University of Toronto professor and the author of "The Rise of the Creative Class." "But it's something we have to address." Rising costs A different type of problem looms over the region: Poor wages are the result of rising minimum and average wages. Houston has a lot of minimum-wage jobs. The last time the Houston minimum wage was increased — to $7.75 by the city in July — the numbers were far from encouraging. In 2009 3e33713323
